D'Annunzio's Italian Regency
of Quarnero Comprises Fiume and Islands.

FUME, Sept. 1. (By the Associated Press.)—Gabriele d'Annunzio, the Italian soldier-poet, who has held possession of Fiume for nearly a year, has made public the text of the constitution of a new state, the "Italian Regency of Quarnero." The new nation will comprise the city of Fiume and several islands in the Adriatic sea. Its existence is to be officially declared Sept. 10.

The constitution is a lengthy document and is written in a poetic style. It is subject to amendment every five years or sooner if changes are requested by one-third of the citizens of the state.

Fiume, which is termed in the document "the guardian of Latin civilization in the extreme east," is to be made an open port to all friendly nations.

Universal military service between the ages of 17 and 55 is provided for by the constitution. Two legislative houses are to be created. There will be an executive commission which will be headed by a foreign minister. A dictator may be selected "in time of extreme danger."

All citizens are required by the constitution to register as workers, of which there are ten classes. They are guaranteed freedom of thought, speech and of the press, and to hold meetings or form associations, whether religious or otherwise. These rights are given without distinction of sex, race or nationality.

The new state also guarantees the inviolability of domicile, the right of habeas corpus, a minimum scale of salaries, allowances in case of illness or enforced idleness and a system of old age pensions. Direct proportional representation is to be established with the right of referendum and the recall of elected officials.
